

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

When transmitting prescribed information using an information page that is supplied from a communication means, designating information that is displayed on the information page to allow the transmission destination to be identified, checked, or selected causes an information transmission page to be displayed in which the destination is set to the transmission destination. The message is entered into this information transmission page and transmitted. The information that allows the transmission destination to be identified, checked, or selected may be, for example, a photograph of the person that is the transmission destination. In other words, the sender of the information designates the transmission destination using, for example, a picture of the person that is the transmission destination.

DISCLOSED BY GOVERNMENT CONTRACT